WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

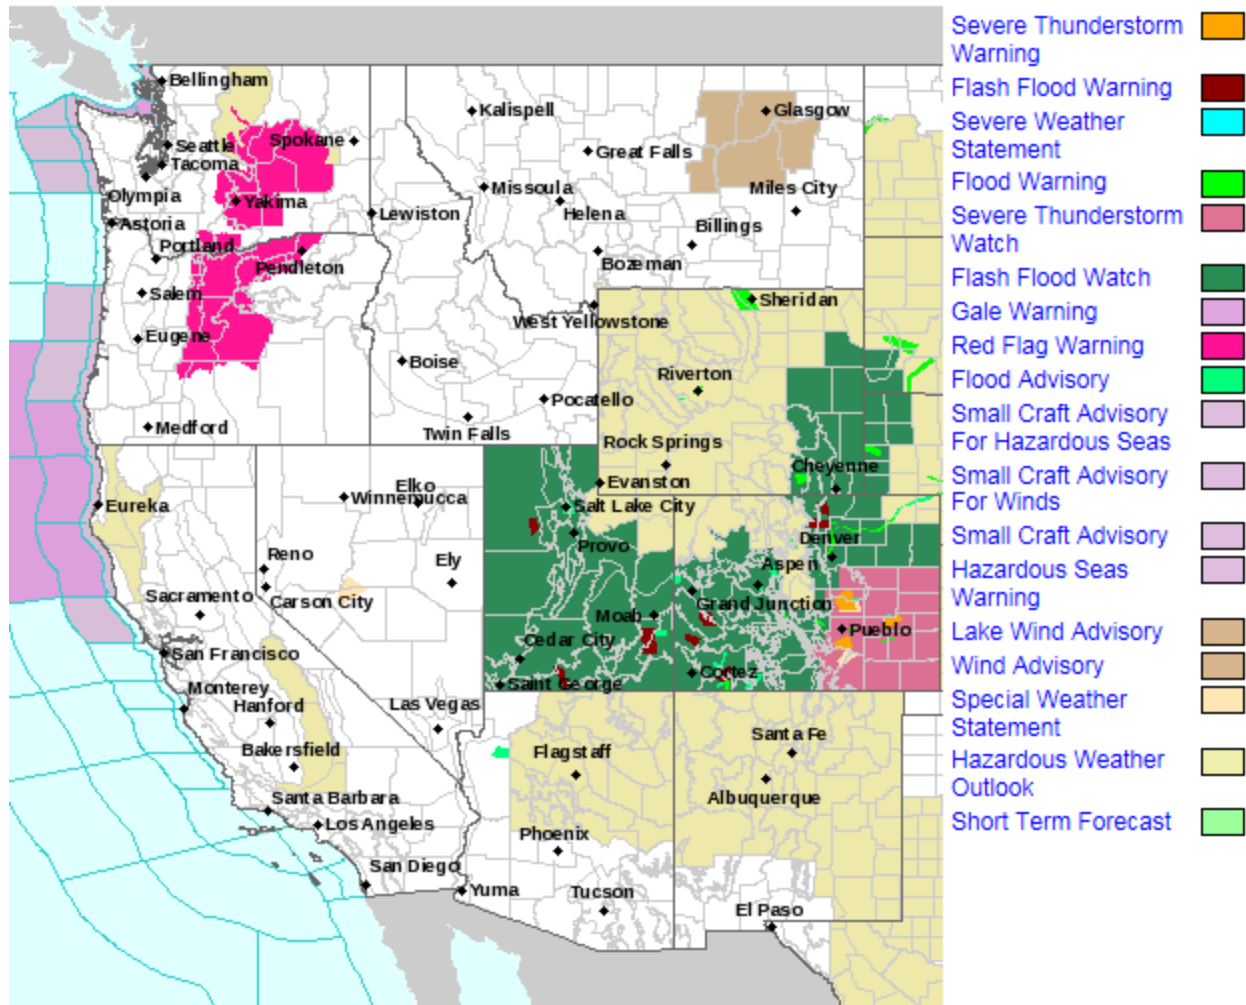

Northern Region

Low pressure of the past 2 days has now moved southeast of Northern California, and high pressure will quickly become stronger over the north state today and Friday. Lightning strike totals dropped from the 3500-plus of Tuesday, to about 200 on Wed., most of which were in or near Lassen County. Max temps will climb back to reach or exceed triple digits in our warmer low valleys by Friday (and for hottest areas it will do so today). Humidity will be dropping into an 8-22 percent range across much of the interior today and/or Friday, and overnight relative humidity recovery will range from just poor to mediocre southwest of about Happy Camp to Lake Tahoe tonight. A tightening of surface pressure gradients is leading to light northwest to northeast winds over the bulk of Northern California for the next 2 1/2 days. There will be areas of moderate speeds (10-20 Gusts 25-33 mph) in the northern and western Sacramento Valley, and also along the eastern foothills Friday morning. The upper ridge flattens some over Northern California Sunday into Monday, but only minor temp and relative humidity relief are expected. And also, that change will also bring about surfacing of stronger southwest to west-northwest p.m. gradient winds over most areas from the Cascade and Sierras eastward next week.

Southern Region

The low pressure area which generated numerous wet thunderstorms yesterday has moved into Nevada and far less thunderstorm activity is expected today. Yesterday afternoon, there were nearly 1,000 lightning discharges over the area. Over an inch of rain was recorded in portions of the Central Coast region as well. Today, the storms will be confined to the highest elevations of the Sierras with only a few cumulus buildups elsewhere. Onshore flow has resulted in a deep marine layer which will be slow in clearing along coastal Southern California. Some fog and drizzle will be possible near the higher terrain this morning. High temperatures will be a couple of degrees cooler than yesterday with afternoon readings in the 60s in the mountains to the 80s in the valleys. Friday, a weak impulse behind the main trough may allow a handful of thunderstorms to form in the Sierras as well as the Angeles and San Bernardino National Forest. But by Saturday, only one or two high elevation Sierra storms are expected. This weekend, a ridge will begin to build across Southern California which will lead to warmer temperatures. Friday through early next week, expect temperatures to warm a degree or two each day, and by Sunday and Monday, the San Joaquin Valley will see temperatures of 100-105. Other interior valleys will be in the mid to upper 90s. Minimum relative humidity will be in the teens for 6-8 hours each day below 5,000 away from the coast. Readings may approach the single digits by Monday or Tuesday. No thunderstorms are expected next week.
